There are thought to be around 7,000 languages in the world today, and they differ from one another in considerable and innumerable ways in how they describing the world.

- Do languages and culture shape thought?
- Do cross-linguistic differences in lexicon and grammar hand nonlinguistic consequences; such that people talk differently end up think differently?
- Do you view the world in a different way after learning a second language?

You’ll find answers in MLLL4753 Language, Culture and Cognition. Come and join the discussion!