

International Student Pandemic Fund

Since the pandemic developed in the spring of 2020, many international students have continued to endure significant stress and hardship attempting to return to their home countries, cover the cost of rent and food and continue their studies. These problems have been worsened by a sometimes perplexing and callous regulatory environment that has created a secondary layer of uncertainty and potential financial distress.

In response, the University has created a high-level International Student Response Task Force to coordinate advocacy, services and problem solving.
Please help us assist our international student community!

Pandemic-related uncertainties have continued in our community. As President Joe Harroz and Interim Provost Jill Irvine wrote in July 2020, "At OU, this is not an international student problem. This is everyone's problem. For 130 years, OU has been a place where our students have thrived and succeeded. It is our obligation, like generations before us, to uphold these values. We are the OU family, and together, we will emerge stronger beyond the pandemic, complete with our remarkable international student community."

The David L. Boren College of International Studies aspires to be a national center of excellence and innovation in international education. Our goals are to broaden international exchange and research partnerships, to enhance the global fluency of our students so they can become compassionate, open-minded global citizens and leaders, and to serve OU's international students. As part of that mission, the College chairs the International Student Response Task Force of deans, vice presidents and directors across OU's three campuses, and houses OU's International Student Services (ISS) unit, which has been providing services to international students for over fifty years. These efforts serve around 2,000 international students and their dependents from over 100 countries across OU.
