Adam Darnell received his doctorate in community psychology from Georgia State University in 2006. He has conducted evaluations of a wide range of programs and initiatives in public, private and philanthropic settings. He specializes in the quasi-experimental evaluation of interventions operating at the system and community level. He joined the Washington State Institute for Public Policy in 2014 to lead the evaluation and benefit-cost analysis of Washington's legalization of non-medical cannabis (Initiative 502).
